TEXTE

- 1 Anyway, that stifling afternoon dragged on forever, and when the hands of the clock on the front wall of our classroom finally hit 2:42 and the bell rang, I leaped out of my seat and shouted, "Hurray!" I was just so glad that it was time to get out of there. I like school and everything, but sometimes enough is enough.
- 5 Mr. Redmont looked shocked. He was probably thinking he'd been so nice letting us make fans* and there I was, not appreciating it at all, just glad the day was over. I felt bad, but I couldn't help what I'd done. I'm like that. I think of something to say, and I say it. I think of something to do, and I do it. Mom calls it impulsive. Sometimes she calls it trouble.
- 10 And I was in trouble then. I could sense it. I've been in enough trouble to know when it's coming.
- Mr. Redmont cleared his throat. He was trying to think of a way to punish me without humiliating me in front of the other kids. Things like that are important to him.
- "Kristy", Mr. Redmont began, and then he changed his mind and started over.
- 15 "Class," he said, "you have your homework assignments. You may go. Kristy, I'd like to see you for a minute."
- While the rest of the kids gathered up their books and papers and left the room, talking and giggling, I made my way up to Mr. Redmont's desk. Before he could say a word, I began apologizing to him. Sometimes that helps.
